

Any restriction or preference of internet accessible content by Internet Service Provider companies would stifle the open nature of the internet, and decrease its effectiveness as a venue for business, communication and information. Further, while allowing such would not in itself promote monopolization of ISPs, it would damage the environment that has so far kept monopolization from being a problem in the industry. Social, and economic culture would both suffer from allowing limitation or preference of content by ISP companies.