

Don't nuke net neutrality!!!!

As a musician, I rely greatly on the internet to market my bands' music, & interact with our fans. If either fans or myself, or particularly both, have our access limited, it has a negative & immediate impact upon our means of communication. I believe that the internet should be equally accessible for all. Specifically, in my case, if a band is on a label that can afford a higher tier of internet class than my bands' resources will allow, then we're effectively unable to compete fairly. This is obviously the case for every facet of the internet, & should, accordingly, be abandoned as an option on the table for the future of the internet.

As an artist, & also a perpetual student, I realize that the internet heralds a new age of capabilities for the free exchange of ideas, with greater potential for interaction than any previously-established medium. If traffic is allowed to be impeded, then this inhibits the 'free market' aspect that is the internet's legacy to date, & in my opinion, would be a devastating blow to what may be the last safe haven of a truly democratic expression of ideas.
