

Keep the internet as is...

I find it outrageous that some corporations wish to control the internet by forcing tolls on websites so that internet users will be able to view their pages. It's a disgrace to our right as citizens to view what we please and when we please on the internet. It brings forth the possibility to cut so many possibilities and experiences off from internet users. Take my own life for example, I could quite possibly lose the chance to talk to all the people that I do from all around the world and learn so much from these people that would be difficult to understand in any other format. As someone who grew up in inner city New Orleans, I had my fair share of experiencing many different cultures, but when I became involved in using the internet a lot I was given the chance to talk to people from the U.K., Germany, Canada, Belgium, Mexico, Spain, Ireland, Brazil, the Netherlands, Czech Republic, Russia, Ukraine, Romania, and Norway. I've been given the chance to exchange ideas and talk about the similarities and differences that exist in our countries. If corporate internet providers are given the possibility to control on-line viewing through tolls, then this could very easily destroy one of the last things that give people from all over the world the chance to come together, talk, and learn from one and about another.
