

Access. Censorship. This journalist says no.

Censorship is a very big issue in my mind. The idea that the FCC are considering blocking websites strikes me as unnecessary. The freedoms I ask for are the freedoms I deserve - to be able to access whatever content I want, whenever I want, and frankly handing control of our rights over to a corporation which thrives on the communication needs of people seems like a very bad idea.

Imagine, for instance, if they chose to block Google. The controversy that would arrive from something like that would generate such a wave of anger within urban and rural communities alike would inevitably end in the boycotting of your organization and the company, and in the end there would be uprisings and you would lose your power.

I want the outlet to express my distaste and opinions on certain subjects. By blocking sites, you violate the very freedoms your forefathers set out to promote in the Constitution. Take the time now to reconsider these moves before you lose out - NO ONE will agree with these, and I'm sure you don't want to lose whatever remaining credibility you have.

Half the nation hates you now, do you want the other half to?
