

Do not abandon Net Neutrality

Personally, I don't even understand how this is even a question. Why should we even consider letting companies dictate where we can and can not go on the Internet, what we can and can not see. It's bad enough now that some Internet provider's are bending to the will of larger provider's such as AOL and banning their own user's email accounts if AOL informs them that the user "may" be sending spam. Now you tell me that here, in America, it is coming down to a question of "Should the phone and cable companies be able to tell us how we can use the Internet". The fact that this is even a question up for debate makes my heart ache. What has happened to MY America? Land of the Free...not Land of the Controlled. What next? Comcast deciding that people in Virginia shouldn't watch television shows about aliens, and suddenly all my Sci-Fi shows are blocked? How about AT&T deciding that I've been on the phone long enough and that for my own health I should hang up and go outside, and so they disconnect me after an hour of chatting with my mom? Crazy? Sure is, but when I see myself writing in to help stop a bill such as the one presented here, it makes me wonder just how crazy our country has become.

Thank You.

--Eryk