

I Can't Work Without the Internet

I'm a regular freelancer for several international arts magazines, and the way I find new, up-and-coming artists around the globe is by searching out their websites online. Many of these artists can barely afford the simplest website; added fees and tolls would shut many of them down, giving them no way to reach viewers and giving me no way to find new artists for the publications that hire me.

My third book, Living the Creative Life: Ideas and Inspiration from Working Artists, comes out next month. It was possible only because I had access to the websites of these 15 artists.

If ATT and the other bullies have their way, the wealthy and well-connected will be able to dictate what we see. The internet should be available to all of us. Please tell them "no."
