

I am disappointed that one of the only things I own, along with all other Americans (the airwaves), is being sold to the existing providers so that they can continue the tradition of "you'll get what I tell you you can have when i tell you you can have it." Locked phones, limited services, inability to get broadband access to the internet through any device capable of providing it, tiers of internet access depending on my importance to their economic model, failure to extend broadband services, failure to innovate with wireless solutions, all caused by entities who are stuck in a business model that is changing more rapidly than they can keep up. VOIP will make calling free, essentially, a model they cannot fathom. Don't support these companies attempts to keep their antiquated businesses afloat at my expense and the expense of my children's future, as they compete on a global stage.
