

Keep Information Free

In order for basic democracy to function, it hinges on an informed public. In this age of communication and information, the fastest and most comprehensive way to get mass quantities of information about any topic of interest is obviously the internet.

By eliminating Net Neutrality, this ability to easily obtain the knowledge one is looking for is lost.

However, this freedom of information is not only rested upon by democracy. As a college student, my education relies on my ability to do thorough but quick research. It goes without saying that the internet is my most valuable resource. By doing away with Net Neutrality, I, the "poor college student", and a voting citizen of this country, would have my functioning role in society as well as my education greatly hindered if I was charged for this vast amount of information.

Bottom line, keep the information free.
