Dear Kevin Martin,

I am a single parent of two beautiful children. As a single income household, there are some extras we must do without, like high speed internet. I call it an extra, but many of their homework assignments involve researching information on-line. Without affordable broadband service, they will fall behind.

I am writing in support of docket number 7-16 because M2Z's proposal would provide free, family friendly broadband service. This solution would increase the use of the internet as an educational tool at school and at home.

American children should not fall behind children from other countries, where reasonably priced broadband is readily available. The FCC should pass docket number 7-16.

Sincerely,

Aida Luberza
