

Acid Music Enthusiast can't distribute his music

I am a Twenty year old kid who just loves making some dance music on a program I own called Acid music. I do this because I love making music, not because I'm trying to make money from my work. I use a program called Utorrent to set up "seeds" of my music so anyone out there on the internet can download my music and listen to it and enjoy.

Apparently Comcast has decided that even though I am a paying customer of their internet service, I can no longer use the bandwidth they allocate to me to put my music out on to the world wide web. Is it even legal for someone to say that I can no longer put my music out on the web? While our fore fathers would have never said anything related to the internet, they definitely said that Free Speech is something every human on this planet should have. It's time we look at their ideas, and update them to accommodate to the 21st century.
