Dear FCC:

I have had Sirius satellite radio now for 3 years and I love it. I really think the merger between Sirius and XM would only make the service better and cheaper. Instead of spending millions of dollars competing with each other, they can combine their resources to provide a better service at cheaper prices. I don't see how it would be a monopoly, since satellite radio will always have to compete with terrestrial radio, iPods, HD radio and internet radio. Since terrestrial radio is free (and many of the internet radio stations, too), this merger would not allow satellite radio to raise its prices. I also think the fact that many of the Congressmen opposed to this merger have accepted money from the NAB is a miscarriage of justice. Why would the NAB be spending so much money to oppose this merger if they are not directly competing with satellite radio? Also, why have there been more hearings on this merger than there were for the merger of Exxon and Mobil? That merger was definitely not in the best interest of the consumer, and yet it got passed with only one hearing. I don't understand how anyone could view this merger as being bad for the consumer (especially since satellite radio is not a necessity for most Americans, like gas is). I really hope that people can come to their senses and allow this merger to go through so that the millions of us with satellite radio can continue to enjoy it in the future. Thank you.

Sincerely,
