

I am shocked that Verizon would block NARAL's completely opt-in and voluntary text messaging campaign. This is a clear abuse of good faith by a wireless gateway. Could they block me from conference calling people over the same matters?

No one but people who want this information would get it. Verizon's clear political interference in what would otherwise be speech given free and open accessibility is a disturbing trend as our communication methods grow more and more privatized.

Taxpayers own the airwaves and auction it off to them, and if they don't want to provide free and open access because of their own political biases, perhaps they shouldn't be allowed to bid.

The FCC must take action to ensure through legislation that free speech codes be extended to text messages because I frankly don't trust private industry to look out for my best interests.
