

Dear FCC I am very concerned about the way radio airwave space is being hogged by up by non-local commercial and non-commercial broadcasters. Low voltage local radio stations have been a very important part of local communities in the past. Small town sports teams may travel great distances to play. Small lowpowered local stations are able to bring the action home. They are also the only place form of broadcast advertisement small local business can afford. Local churches use to carry some of their services on local stations, serving the homebound in their communities, without preying on their small wallets. These are just a few reasons to put an end to the multi-billion dollar industry of religious monopolies abusing their rights. These big business religious corporations care nothing about the people they serve, only the money they can squeeze out of them. Take everything I've just said about the religious stations and replace religious with PBS or for profit corporations. These stations need to have a local presence in the communities, help bolster the economies, and start to share the public airwaves with other users, after all the airwaves are public, and local in nature.
