

The First Amendment ensures freedom of speech, period. Dictating what can or cannot be broadcasted is unconstitutional and, therefore, unlawful. If someone disagrees or is offended by a comment or broadcast, they also have the inalienable right to pursue their own personal happiness and turn the station. Just as the ACLU is quick in pointing out the separation of Church and State whenever convenient to them (although this "rule" is found nowhere in the US Constitution), government has no place in dictating what any station can broadcast.
