Dear FCC:

Â It has really become a matter of political favors and who is paying off whom in America these days, hasn't it?

I own iPods and a Sirius receiver. I hear music on the internet, on iTunes, over terrestrial radio, and in several other ways, all of which compete with each other for my dollars. No competition is a non-issue.

I don't hear Eskimos and Blacks being all that well represented in all of Clear Channel's radio networks. I don't see CBS Radio or TV being forced to accommodate special interest groups in order to hold on to their licenses. The idea of a Sirius/XM company having to give 20% of their spectrum to such groups is ridiculous unless you are going to apply the same rules to TV and Radio broadcasters all over the nation.

The FCC has been a joke in the last 20 years. The prudish inhibition of creativity by a government agency bending to the will of Christian fanatics and people who are essentially sending form letters to object to shows they have never watched because their churches told them to is not the way America is supposed to function, and it makes me angry as an American to have to agree with the sentiment that America is becoming a nation to be ashamed of because of the actions of a government that is bought and sold for dollars that aren't worth very much anymore.

All this political wrangling going on around this merger would not be going on if it were the oil companies who hve the dough to spread around to Senators and Congressmen and FCC commissioners. I am ashamed of you all.

ASHAMED!

Sincerely,

Hector M. Lugo
