

To the members of the Federal Communications Commission:

I'm writing to urge you to open up currently unused parts of the TV spectrum (the "white spaces") for wireless broadband and other emerging technologies. I applaud the extraordinary steps the Commission has taken to realize the potential of TV white spaces to date, and encourage you to take this next step today.

The potential benefits of freeing up this important public resource, more than three-quarters of which today is unused, are overwhelming.

The white spaces can:

- * Pave the way for universal wireless broadband access;
- * Extend broadband wireless to rural areas that currently aren't connected at all;
- * Enhance the reliability of public safety communications;
- * Enable distance learning for students in remote locations or for whom traditional classroom-based learning is impractical; and,
- * Bring high-speed mobile internet access to every high school and middle school in the country.

Opening up unused TV spectrum might be one of our best remaining chances to address the digital divide by creating affordable and truly universal broadband wireless coverage in the U.S.. I urge you to take this rare opportunity to connect millions more people to the Internet.

I would like to add:

1. I feel it is important to keep these airwaves free. The broadcast spectrum is a resource that belongs to the American people and should not be sold to private interests (not more than it already has of course).
2. Guidelines and regulations should be developed to ensure non-interference with existing broadcasters.
3. We should use these frequencies to help coordinate emergency responders.

I will trust you to do the right thing and remember to keep the best interests of the American people above competing Business interests.

Thanks you.
