

Violence on TV definitely has an impact on children and it is in a negative manner. Today more than ever, young children are becoming more and more interested in various types of video games that all share the common theme of violence and war, and it is due to the television programming that they are watching. Although I believe the above statement(s) to be true, I am not sure of how big of an actual problem it is. I believe that a mentally stable child coming from a good family will not be affected by the violence in a negative manner and it will not affect the way he/she lives their life. I do believe that individuals who have some sort of psychological problem may be affected more by violent TV programs, because unstable people are more likely to be swayed by outside factors of life.
