

I think children's programming has made progress in the past decade. I remember growing up watching violent cartoons like the power rangers and Batman. Today, I do not think it is the programs that are hindering our children. I do not think they are violent. However, I do think that adult programs like wrestling, which many children watch, does have an impact on children. We cannot assume that children are not watching these programs while their parents are at work. These programs teach young girls to be submissive to men, young men to disrespect girls and that overall fighting is fun. As far as children's programming, shows like Sponge Bob or Hannah Montana are not violent at all; they are just teaching gender stereotypes. This is something I realized can't be avoided. As for violence, it is more about the video games and the adult programming children continue to tune into.
