

The technology of TVGuardian has allowed me to enjoy movies with my children that they would otherwise have missed because of the vulgar language. Even in PG movies now, there appear just enough offensive and vulgar words that I find not suitable for young children who would otherwise enjoy the movie. Likewise with more and more television shows.

Unfortunately, this technology is not widely enough available.

Although I have one of the devices hooked to my TV and find it generally sufficiently accurate in eliminating the offensive language, it would be much easier if this technology were available as imbedded in the DVD or accessible through satellite or cable without the necessity of routing.

Furthermore, I would gladly pay a small monthly fee for having this technology available more widely.

I suspect most discerning parents would likewise be willing to do so.

Frankly, I think the companies who produce the DVDs are missing a very large market in not issuing a "cleaned up" version of many of their movies. Hopefully, the current issue before the FCC will be of some help to parents like myself who have these concerns.
