

In regards to the method by which the supposed $7.4bil should be spent on the telecom networks, it is not only my opinion, but the opinions of many, that with it, the Internet should continue to run in a similar manner as it does now. A very few companies should hold the keys to the Internet, in order to better regulate traffic flow, but most importantly, it should remain as is in regards to Net Neutrality. If this money comes from the government, lobbyists will no doubt be bickering over what companies and services should be reserved a "fast lane" on the network. This is utterly ridiculous, because 90% of the net is created, operated, and owned by the private sector. For each corporate website, there are 9 personal, home run websites. The essence of the internet would be crushed into disarray. So, as an avid internet user, and someone who appreciates the one, and only, unregulated form of media, I come crawling to you to ensure that the internet remains its ever changing, unchained self.
