

I currently pay Comcast Cable over $100/month to receive in excess of 100 channels. Of these channels my family only watches about 10, but because of the cable company's packaging of channels, we are forced to pay for all the channels we never watch just to receive the 10 we do. Digital programming now makes it possible for the cable companies to deliver to each address only those channels requested by that address. Yet they fail to offer this option to their customers, requiring us to pay for products (channels) we never use. What other industry does this? I can't think of any. This practice should be stopped, and the public should be given the option to pay for only that which they actually watch, instead of being gouged for extra money by greedy cable companies. I believe the FCC should require this option be made available to all cable customers.