

There is definitely too much violence on television, especially in movie commercials shown during the broadcast of family shows. Although shows like American Idol or some sports television is not directly targeted toward young children, very frequently children are in the same room as their parents who are watching a show. It can be traumatic for a child to look over and see an advertisement of a movie such as Saw or other rated R movies. In general, advertisements for movies with a certain age restriction should match the rating of the show being broadcast, meaning showing an ad of rated R movie should not be allowed during rated PG or G broadcast.
