

It is my understanding from postings on the Internet that the MPAA has filed one or more documents with the FCC suggesting that the government should be responsible for detecting possible illegal copying of licensed content on the Internet. I was under the impression that the government already did have systems in place for investigating illegal copying of movies, given the FBI warning displayed at the beginning of every VHS tape and now every DVD that I buy or rent.

The Internet is used for many more things than simply distributing products represented by the MPAA. I do not believe the government should use tax payer money to support the business models of the movie industry and their representatives. The industry already has many tools at its disposal, many of which it pays for itself to maintain.

Any suggestions by the MPAA regarding net neutrality should be ignored.