

Hi,

I like to file a complaint against CNET and John Chans article about me, my company and my product. He obviously saw the product at <http://www.notcot.org/?action=search&show=&query=digigrip> and decided to make his very own version that are published and read by millions worldwide on several different websites. I do not know the person that published it on notcot.org
This is the article he wrote http://news.cnet.com/8301-17938_105-10399758-1.html , I have written to him and to the editorial chief without any response.

I am a Swedish citizen that have a company in Hong Kong, He suggest that is fishy. I do have a crappy website, but you have to consider that I never went out public with it and all energy has been in to making this product as good as possible, also a crappy website has nothing to do with whether or not you are trustworthy, all scam artists I ever meet where ties and have shiny shoes. He assumes that this is a product that end users can only put in them self, wrong! I sell to factories that make suitcases for Samsonite, Tumi and several other brands.

I think if you work with media and have such big audience you should check the facts first, I have my phone number on the website as well as email and address for snail mail.

I want CNET to remove this from all their outlets as soon as possible along with a written explanation from John Chan. He has no right to portray me, my product and my company in such way.

The proceedings is probably wrong, I tried Google and your website for more info but came up empty handed.
