

It's abundantly clear to a majority of people who work on the Internet that this Internet is the world's last hope. I shudder to think of where the world really would be without an Internet to keep the governments of the world in check and businesses honest, as well as giving journalism a class in how it's done. In a world that seems perched precariously on a coup de' tat, where information becomes a controlled commodity, it's been the Internet that has united the world and given all of us a voice. These reasons for keeping the Internet neutral and free for all far outweigh the motivations for profit by monopolies at the heart of wanting to make the Internet into something else.
