

FCC must stand up for internet neutrality.

My ISP, Comcast, has interrupted Netflix movies I watch over x-box 360 `15 minutes into the movie. The interruptions occurred every few minutes as the bandwidth was progressively worsened in steps that delayed the program repeatedly as well as steps that rendered the image worthless. The driving purpose was to provide me the opportunity to buy a pristine movie experience offered for sale y my ISP.

My ISP, Comcast, has interfered with my contract with my voip provider. Sometimes I get an email message while I am online but the phone doesn't ring. Yep, the email of the phone call arrived, but the actual phone call never rang my phone. Yep, the red light announcing a message for me to retrieve sometimes doesn't light and sometimes it does even without a message. Note that my recent change of ISP was the beginning of degraded and unreliable phone service due to interference by my ISP of the open internet signal. The driving purpose was to provide me the opportunity to buy a pristine voip experience offered for sale by my ISP.

Above and beyond the sleeze in business practice is the impact such ISP control has on the freedom of a Nation. Corporate control of the media is strangling the function of a great nation. My ability to post to the internet could compromise my contribution to sailing the ship of democracy.

Its not like the ISP has rights to the channel of communication, but rather, has the obligation to serve the utility built on the brainpower of others. The sleeze of the bully on the block will ultimately suffocate freedom. Extortion is a crime. The FCC must not cave to financial pressure extorting freedom from the people.
