

I strongly support the FCC's proposed "Net Neutrality" rules - specifically, that broadband providers must:

- ** Not block users from sending legal content on the net
- ** Let users run the applications and services they like and connect whatever devices they care to
- ** Not harm competition among ISPs or online services, nor discriminate against content services
- ** Disclose to users and the federal government how they manage their networks

The internet should, and must, remain a resource in which web sites and services succeed or fail on their own merits - not based on decisions made by broadband (or other) providers to block, speed up or slow down Web content based on its source, ownership or destination.

Thank you.
