

The internet and all its innovative inroads must be open, much like the economy, and free for all to use at the same speed (unlike the economy). Who, when, and how people access to information should not be decided by anything other than the First amendment. Especially not online. It's easy to circulate a leaflet today, but if every scrap of paper in the U.S. was owned by a news company, do you think they would share? Of course not, they would sell. Keep the American dream alive into the 21st century, keep the internet open for all.
