

The Internet can and should always be a strong force for the Democratization of information in the World. Unfortunately, Government Censorship can effectively eliminate the Internet's ability to provide open and unfettered access to alternative sources of information. Because of the constant dangers of Censorship by Governments , the FCC should enact strong rules that keep the internet free from blocking, censorship and discrimination and ensure that Internet Service Providers disclose all attempts to manage content. In this way can the FCC offer assurance that Universal un-censored access will remain as the primary operating standard for information on the Internet. With this policy also the Internet will remain as a strong force for the Democratization of information in the World.
