I recently learned that the FCC intends to begin moving forward on the issue of Net Neutrality. As the owner of a printing and imaging company, I know and understand the importance of a fair, open and competitive market. My company is one that is highly technical and competitive. We make use of various types of technologies such as the internet for online ordering, e-mail, mailing services and shipping.

The Internet and wireless markets continue to grow rapidly because of the demand consumers place on those private companies providing these goods and services. I am concerned that government intervention in an already highly competitive market will stifle growth rather than create opportunities.

These companies have spent billions of dollars to build the infrastructure necessary to create the increasingly competitive market that exists today. I encourage you to focus on the issue of expanding broadband to areas not covered today rather than placing barrier in the path of those companies introducing innovative products to the marketplace.

Sincerely,

Gary Owen
President
