

It is vital to my scholarly work to have full and free access to web sources, as I have today. I call on you to preserve 'net neutrality': do not give corporations the right to decide what anyone can see on the internet. It is a precious freedom, now under serious threat: you must protect this kind of freedom of the press, even though those who wrote the constitution and bill of rights had no inkling that this new electronic medium might rival and even surpass the press in its importance to free speech and freedom of thought and opinion.
