

To what ever bureaucrat might read this. The FCC was instituted to regulate the assignment of band width to public and private parties for commercial use.

Neither the FCC, the President, the Congress, or the Judicial branch of government et al does not have the moral or legal authority to censor or restrict free speech by any American citizen or content contained in any communication medium.

Even if you don't agree with the content of said communications, keep your regulatory hands off the internet.

It (the internet) is NOT a political bargaining chip to be used to shut up opinions you (rhetorically) might not agree with.

The American people are watching and waiting and government is getting periously close to the limits of restrictive legislation.

Skip Porterfield

Pearland, Texas