

Net neutrality is critical. In order to destroy democracy one must limit access to news and information, all the while while pretending that we live in a "free" society. Any net-neutrality legislation that gives priority to certain types of information and less to others will inevitably result in rich, powerful corporations getting their disinformation on the Web and honest -- but smaller -- providers being priced out of the market.

If you care about American Democracy you must reject the notion of "preferred" internet content.

The way for information providers to get their content more widely distributed on the web is **already exists** -- BUY MORE SERVER POWER. People that claim they need "preferred" delivery pipes are either lying about how the technology works, or remaining purposefully ignorant so they can spread disinformation and yet keep a clean ("I didn't know that then") conscience. They secretly wish to control the medium and the message.

The delivery networks should remain what they are: electronic info pipes that deliver information equally to all providers.

Kip Leitner