

I do not want the internet become like cable has, which is devoid of relevant and interesting information.

I do not feel that the way the internet currently operates necessitates any takeover by the telephone and cable companies.

If you haven't noticed, these TV and Phone companies don't currently operate their mediums efficiently or in a way that promotes openness.

In fact, if the internet was to be censored, who's to say that these companies won't censor other companies' ads and content? Why limit something that doesn't currently need limiting?

The internet is the epitome of the American dream and free enterprise, why take this away?

Who are going to be regulating the regulators? What is the point in changing something that operates just fine the way it is.

Also, look at Google. How do you think they will respond to this? They just pulled out of China for very similar reasons.

Please, please, please do not let the internet become even more regulated that it already is, as this will severely limit the potential of start-up businesses and mom and pop stores.

Wal-mart has to get some competition from somewhere. What is threatening about that?

Anytime the FCC gets involved with anything they mess it up. I used to love TV, movies, all that good stuff. Now, it's all shit. There are very few options available to people in rural areas. Why further isolate these people because of their economic status and/or their geographic location?

You will have some very upset people if this actually occurs.
