

As a parent, medical student, and former computer programmer, I have come to appreciate the incredible freedom and equality of access that the Internet offers from multiple perspectives. The incredible breadth and depth of information available online is priceless, and the ability of individuals and groups with meager funding to present important information that can be accessed as easily as corporate advertising is priceless. Groups advocating for victims of abuse or for better childhood nutrition or encouraging better math education are just as easy for my children and I to access as our online banking information or shopping sites. Any changes that impede the free flow of this vital information online would be catastrophic. Please act very deliberately to preserve network neutrality. The Internet would not be what it is today without neutrality, and it will not realize its wonderful potential without continued neutrality.

Jonathan Moretz

Doctor of Medicine candidate

Eastern Virginia Medical School

Class of 2013