Re: GN Docket No. 09-191

January 11, 2010

Dear Chairman Genachowski and Commissioners:

I am concerned that the Federal Communications Commission is currently considering enacting burdensome and unnecessary regulations on the Internet. These regulations will jeopardize much needed private sector investment, slow broadband deployment and lead to consumers being hurt by less competition. In these touch economic times, are these really the policies that should be pursued?

We all know how dramatically advanced communications technology and the Internet have changed our lives. I can tell you from firsthand experience that they have changed the way my family and I communicate, work and live. Looking to the future, our reliance on the Internet and advanced technologies will only continue to increase.

It is also clear that investment in broadband and Internet technologies creates jobs. We need government policies in place that encourage investment, job creation and economic development.

Maintaining the communications network to support the Internet and the many advanced tools we use to communicate requires large amounts of investment from the private sector. Fortunately, technology and Internet growth has flourished in an environment free of government intervention – we need to continue on that path.

Please keep the opportunity for investment and future innovations moving forward. Government policies should encourage future investment and advancement, not get in the way. I urge you to not enact "Net Neutrality" regulations.

Thank you

Matthew J. Cybulski
