

I call on the FCC to act in the public interest and set rules that establish a free and open internet. Net neutrality is a founding principle of the internet that must be preserved. It's also overwhelmingly supported by the public. Internet users understand that companies providing the means to access the internet should not be allowed to privilege their own content over others' and shouldn't be able to limit what customers access.

The telecommunications industry, understandably, would like as much control over the internet as they can get federal regulators to agree to. The FCC should allow only as much as is reasonable for them to have, and that includes enacting a strong rule that preserves net neutrality.
