

Now that the Internet has become a powerful educational tool and the preferred medium for daily commerce and social interaction for the upcoming generation of Americans, constitutional freedoms and safeguards must be extended into this domain.

I am writing to urge the FCC to support Net Neutrality.

I speak for my students as well, who are not yet of voting age but have a vested interest in this issue.

To sell online access to knowledge for profit will undermine public education.

As a result of California's financial woes, the free Internet is now my - only - source for the video clips, interactive simulations, and websites that engage my middle school students.

Please support America's commitment to a free and public education for every citizen.

Enact strong rules that will allow me and my students to control our Internet experience free from blocking, censorship and discrimination.

Do not give in to pressure from AT&T, Comcast, Verizon and their lobbyists -- whose only concern is profit.

Sincerely, Hope Oliver
