

Ensuring open, fast internet for all is vital for progress in this country. Every other country understands this and has made internet access competitive and the results are amazing. People in Sweden and Korea are among the most wired countries in the world. Their access to much higher broadband speeds (at a lower competitive cost) puts our internet access to shame. And now telecom corporations want to charge more and give the prime fruit to people who can pay more? Absolutely shameful. Internet = information = education = knowledge = innovation.
