

Industry front group Americans for Prosperity wrote that there hasn't been "a single significant incident of egregious behavior" by phone and cable companies," adding that Net Neutrality is "a solution in search of a problem."

I was subscribed to AT&T's U-Verse for a period of about a year. During that time I was subjected to frequent throttling of bandwidth. Peer to Peer traffic was frequently targeted, as well as some more of my high bandwidth applications such as my online gaming.

There was nothing in their Terms of Service about not allowing me certain access, customer service denied it was happening (despite my logs showing otherwise), and generally no one was helpful.

They play by their own rules and can get away with anything! I switched to Time Warner, but with only 2 options for decent internet speeds, who do I turn to if Time Warner wants to start playing games?
