

I'm writing in regards to FCC plans to regulate the Internet and Internet Service Providers.

I'm not sure if this is the "third way" or not, but the Internet needs to remain open and free, but it needs some regulation to make sure these huge ISP's in the United States don't continue to hold us back and raise the rates we pay.

The Comcast case is the perfect example.

It's the classic American political battle: will things end up benefiting the big rich powerful ISP's, who's only interest is making more money, or the common people, who want to get an open Internet product for a decent price without excessive restrictions on their Internet use?
