

An open internet is highly essential in my life. Right now I am taking online classes through a university in my state to get my Bachelor's degree, I am doing volunteer testing for a video game company that lives on the other side of the United States and most of my friends keep in touch with me through facebook or some other online program. If I cannot have net neutrality, my whole future is ruined and I end up alone in the world.

The FCC must act now because right at this moment the internet is still relatively young. If we set up laws to protect it from corporations looking for any little dollar they can squeeze out of us, we can make sure that creativity that the internet has sprouted does not die. We cannot afford to lose a source of communication this big to corporations. It is bad enough that China censors its people, do we want to make it that the corporations are censoring us because we cannot pay their insane prices? We have seen what corporate America has done to everything else, why would we trust them alone with the internet?
