

I use the net constantly, for education, information, research, enjoyment. It is becoming a large part of my news source, through a huge variety of sites.

The American populace is already under-educated and overworked. For most people, getting news is at the bottom of a long daily to-do list. Anything that makes it slower or more difficult will only further shrink the already diminishing number of people who are able to vote intelligently, debate issues with any degree of knowledge, and make positive contributions to the furtherance of our government and our country.

Who benefits from greater control over the net? The powers that be--the same powers that benefit from all the tax and social legislation that continually eats away at the middle class.