

I use the internet every day to read news, communicate with friends and family and shop. I visit blogs and websites for entertainment and information. I am also a web designer, creating small sites for professionals and small businesses. It's already hard enough to get a site noticed, if companies like Verizon get a stranglehold on what kind of content can be viewed how will my clients get their message across? How can that possibly be good for our economy?

Dear FCC officials, you work for the people of this country, not the corporations you were put in office to regulate. The internet is for everyone, not just the rich and powerful. You have an obligation to keep our national infrastructure free of corporate bias and control. If a handful of corporations are allowed to take control of the web, how will those of us who use it every day to reach customers and communicate with the world manage? It's like making all the rest of us into second class citizens. Please enforce Net Neutrality. It's the right thing for our country.
