

The internet is an essential part of everyone's life, from communication, to finding answers to basic questions and pretty much anything in between. If these two companies are to be left unregulated what evils can come of it? What is to happen to our ability to communicate freely and have ideas of our own that are not based on the ideologies of the masses or of some money-hungry conglomerate. It is unrealistic for anyone to think that these companies will not sway this technology to suit their own pocket books and not the people they "serve". The internet is a place for free speech and freedom of expression, what is to happen when they place a price on that and corrupt it to their own needs.

The Internet cannot be owned or regulated by anyone but the FCC. It should be regulated by only they and the people who use it, not the companies with the largest budgets. They should not allow any changes to be made to the regulations of the internet. Its that simple. Google and Verizon should not have been allowed to even put forth such a ludicrous idea. It never should have happened.
