

As a consumer, I already pay my internet provider. I expect them to give me equal access to any (legal) content I want to use. If I use too much bandwidth, they can charge me more, so my ISP does not carry a financial burden if I use the internet more than someone else.

As a webmaster, I already pay my internet provider. I expect them to give my website equal access to anyone who wants to view it. If I use too much bandwidth, they can charge me more, so my ISP does not carry a financial burden if I use the internet more than someone else.

The telecoms are double-dipping. They want internet users and content providers to pay for extra bandwidth usage they are already paying for. This is an attempt to further force consumers to do business with large corporations. This is no different for mobile and wireless services as it is for wire-based ones. Give the consumers access to the services they pay for!