

I feel that the FCC is not working in the best interests of consumers with regard to support tiered and gateway pricing from internet service providers.

Recent experiments in tiered pricing would allow 5 Gig of transfer a month for 30 dollars. Watching ONE (yes ONE) single movie is 4 Gig of transfer.

That means that my nightly netflix movie before bed now becomes a monthly movie. Playing World of Warcraft a few nights a week now goes out the window because I can't afford the "premium transfer" rates. Not to mention the fact that now my internet provider becomes my internet censor, deciding (without any input from or notification to me) what I can and can't see and which types of activities are "premium".

Does anyone at the FCC actually care about consumers or are you all bucking for CEO positions with cable companies once the time in your current position has ended? Your position is incredibly one sided and makes me very upset.

You need to care for and protect the citizens of the country not assist Comcast in their latest efforts to fleece every last nickle from their customres.
