

I had a suggestion for more FCC regulation, though companies probably won't like it. I suggested that tablet companies are forced to update their tablet software themselves, rather than having the carrier (US Cellular, Sprint, etc.) do it. Outdated software can cause security risks to both the websites you visit, and your own device. But as it stands, tablets require a carrier to update the software (Both US Cellular and Radio Shack said this.) The "Nook" Color however, receives updates via WiFi only, since it has no carrier.

Sincerely,
Ian A. Carlson