

I oppose the acquisition of T-Mobile USA by AT&T. The deal will result in an unhealthy oligopoly for consumers. Even though AT&T claims that competition will remain, the competition would undoubtedly be small wireless providers with limited coverage, contract options and supported devices. Such alternatives are not competitive options. Personally, I prefer T-Mobile to other providers because of their dedication to customer service and their early and continued support of the Android operating system, as well as the Android development community. While neither of these affect the legality of the sale, they are two examples of T-Mobile's unique position as a nationwide service provider with a tenacious approach to gaining and retaining customers as well as supporting innovative technologies. AT&T, given its market share, shows no urgency in improving customer satisfaction nor adopting new tech (e.g. lack of 4g).
