

I do not think the AT&T buyout of T-mobile is a good move for consumers. You can look at quarterly reports from AT&T and see that they do not re-invest their money back into improving their network. Their promise of expanded 4G coverage is a lame attempt to win over approval, but won't be actually done for a very long time, if they do it at all. This will also hurt consumers with only having three national carriers, and will also mean less wireless carriers to offer unlimited data. They should also be forced to put in place a feature to turn off data services when the consumer reaches their monthly allotment, to allow them to prevent overage fees OR be mandated to bring back unlimited plans at a reasonable price. Technology has gotten cheaper and more efficient. They should not be dropping unlimited internet services for wireless or wired providers.
